

FL-01: Draw the Path – Portfolio Sitemap + Toolkit

Name: Sibgha Mursaleen

Date: 12 June 2026

One Action

I want potential clients to view my work and contact me to hire me for frontend web development projects.

Proof Statement

I help early-stage SaaS and AI founders launch their first professional landing page, creating a polished and credible online presence that builds trust from the customer's first impression.

Change after Claude's feedback

I refined my sitemap by making it more focused on early-stage SaaS and AI founders. I will structure my project pages around the problem, solution, and design decisions instead of only showing screenshots. I will also include a clear "Message Me" call-to-action on every project page.

Diagnosed fragmented navigation undermining conversion funnel and proof strategy

Let me walk it the way your actual founder would — cold, on a phone, deciding in under 10 seconds whether to keep clicking.

Home — earns its place, but underbuilt.

Hero + Featured Projects + CTA is correct in principle. The problem: nothing in this outline speaks to your specific claim. "Featured Projects" and "Call to Action" are generic labels that would fit any developer's portfolio. Nothing here says "day one," "unproven product," or "first professional site" — the exact language of your claim. If the hero copy doesn't restate your claim almost word-for-word, this page is proving nothing, just displaying work.

About — wasted, as scoped.

"Your story, skills, experience, photo" is the classic default About page, and it doesn't move a launching founder any closer to believing your claim. They don't need your career story — they need evidence you can take zero-to-credible fast. A skills list and a bio are not proof; they're background noise a busy founder will skip. If you keep this page at all, it needs to be reframed around why you specifically understand first-time launches — not a generic bio.

Work/Portfolio — earns its place, but the content underneath isn't specified, and that's the actual risk.

"Project showcases, case studies" is the right shape, but the sitemap doesn't say the case studies are framed as launches. If a founder clicks in and sees generic "here's a screenshot" project cards, you've proven "I can build websites," not "I can take an unproven product and make it look funded on day one." Every case study here needs to explicitly show: what the startup had before (nothing, or a placeholder), what problem you solved, and why it now reads as credible. Without that framing, this page proves a different, more generic claim than the one you wrote.

Contact — wasted as a separate page, and it dilutes your one action.

You decided your ONE action is "send me a message describing your project." This page instead offers four options: contact form, email, GitHub, LinkedIn. That's not one action, that's a menu — and every extra option is a decision the founder has to make instead of just messaging you. It also doesn't need to be its own page. Making someone click to a fourth page just to take the one action you want is friction you don't need.

What's missing entirely:

1. A "day one" framing device. Nowhere in this sitemap does anything explicitly acknowledge "you have nothing yet, and that's exactly who I build for." That's the core of your claim and it isn't represented on any page.
2. A low-risk reason to reach out. You told a founder in your Version 3 draft "I'll tell you honestly whether it's worth it" — that reduces the risk of messaging a stranger. This sitemap has no place that reassurance lives.
3. Repeated CTA on every page. Only Home has one listed. A founder who lands on Work/Portfolio first (very likely, if they click a project link from somewhere else) has no CTA in front of them at all.

What I'd cut: Contact as a standalone page — fold the single action (message me) directly into Home and into every project page, and drop email/GitHub/LinkedIn down to small footer links, not competing options.

What I'd fix: About — either cut it or rebuild it entirely around your claim, not your resume.

One question before you touch the sitemap again: right now this reads as a 4-page personal portfolio template with your claim bolted onto the hero. If you deleted the word "SaaS/AI founder" from every page, would a visitor still be able to tell who this site is for? If the honest answer is no, that's the actual problem — not the page count.
